Past Covid: Vision

Well, here we go sort of? I was in a group of Christians and they were talking about God's vision for people. The big question is what is that vision? What does that have to do with travel? A ton really. My last 22 years have been spent traveling. I have tried to live a life worth living. Every year there has been adventure and memorable experiences. I was not going to live on the other side of divorce in despair. Plus, I realized that I had not lived to that point in my life. I was given vision.

Now, was it God's vision? People seem to think that the only visions God will give to people is to serve the church. I will refute that by saying I believe God wants us to use our passions and talent to serve others. That serving will come in many ways. For me, it's trying to live a dynamic life of travel. A life spent at concerts, events, and yes, even church. I have been given a vision of living life to the fullest. To me, that includes travel. I want to inspire others to live now. Far too many people say they want to see this or that. They say that they want to travel and go here and there. Yet, time after time they are scrambling to grasp a few things before they die. My vision includes trying things before the word death becomes a reality.

I only mention my church life because vision is real to me. I could see myself on the beach in Waikiki and it happened. I dreamt of a cruise and did it. My wife had cancer and our trip to Australia was bombed because of it. I still have that vision of standing at the Sydney Opera house. Then covid bombed our Italy trip. I still want to take a jumping picture in-front of the coliseum in Rome. I still have that vision. There are plenty more. This blog is still alive because my vision of trips and living life to the fullest is not dead. Yes, I have to decide on taking the vaccine. Yes, I will have to save for a new trip. I still want this. I can still see it. Keep the vision alive!
